gathered in the vicinity and the principal approach, Rue St. Antoine, was thronged by a frenzied mob. They demanded arms and ammunition which, not forthcoming, they rushed to the armory of the French guard. Word was then sent to the assembly that the attack on the Bastile would begin at once. Several assaults were made on the drawbridge and the mob was constantly increasing. Many shots were fired at the men behind the guns in the fortress and DeLaunay, who was the governor of the fortress, lost his head and ordered his men to fire into the mob. That order marked the beginning of the end. The portcullis was drawn up, the garrison fired on the panic-stricken mob, many were killed and fell into the ditch.

The mob rushed into the presence of the assembly, crying "Treachery!" and carrying the victims of the defenders of the fort. On the outside of the Hotel de Ville were 200,000 men and women shrieking for vengeance and crying "On to the Bastile." Many of these men and women were armed with muskets, pikes, sabers and hatch: and foreign weapons, which they had stolen from the guard. While the assembly was trying to reach some conclusion another mob came from the Bastile carrying more of the wounded and declaring that they had been betrayed by the provost of the mechants, De Flesselles. They rushed down the aisles and dragged De Flesselles into the street, where he was assassinated.

The mob continued to increase about the The tri-colored banner of France waved proudly in the breezes of Sweet Springs grove, on the outskirts of Rosedale, yesterday afternoon, where the French residents of Kansas City and suburbs had gathered to celebrate their great national holiday, in commemoration of the fall of the bastile. As July 14 fell on last Friday, the committee in charge postponed the celebration until yesterday, so that all could attend the festivities at the grove. The executive officers of the "Societe Francaise de Secours Mutuels," in English being the French Mutual Aid Society, had made elaborate preparations for the celebration and when the Frenchmen and their families began to arrive about 3 o'clock the grounds were provided with tables, seats and refreshment stands, while everywhere were flags and banners. It was significant that wherever a French flag floated or a French banner fluttered there was also "Old Glory." Not only was the friendly sentiment of the French patriots towards their present home thus conspicuously expressed, but throughout the entire exercises the most generous tribute was paid this country by the speakers.

Owing to the light rain of the morning and threatening clouds of midday the attendance was not as large as expected, but for all that the occasion was a pronounced success. Refreshment booths were everywhere among the trees, and French hospitality was limitless. Nearly all of the fifty-four members of the French society were present with their families, as well as many guests of other nationalities.

What the Day Means.

The fall of the Bastile marked the begin ning of the most momentous period of history-the assertion of the rights of the individual man irrespective of birth or condition. It was an uprising that shaped the destiny of every civilized nation on the earth and put a quietus on "the divine right of kings" and brought about to a large degree the present system of constitutional

It was the greatest monument in the progress of the revolution and the revolu-tion was probably the greatest monument in the onward march of humanity. The ses that led to this terrible convulsion of the French nation had been, as students of that period know, piling up for years, They were grevious and had crushed the ple by their weight. Historians do not all agree in their records of the stirring events of the times, but they do agree that the fall of the Bastile marked the beginning of that terrific uprising.

On the morning of July 14, 1789, the populace demanded arms and ammunition from the government, which was then repre-sented by the assembly-according to the sented by the assembly—according to the statement of an eye witness, M. Louis-Guillaume Pitra, an elector of Paris and whose story is to-day accepted as a standard—and were sent to an arsenal near the Bastile. But here they learned that the Weapons and the ammunition had been transferred to the Bastile. Great crowds and blow up the fortification.

The terms of capitulation were accepted by Hulin and the people generally, but it was found impossible to protect the governor from the fury of the mob. Hulin endeavored to save him but he was torn from his arms and cut to pleces and Hulin himself was cut down and left in a pool of blood. Of the garrison, which numbered himself was cut down and left in a pool of blood. Of the garrison, which numbered 130 men, only five were killed or wounded; of the assailants, eighty-two men were killed and twenty-two died afterwards of their wounds; more than 150 were wounded. After the capture the citizens broke into the cells of the Bastile and liberated all the prisoners. In all there were fourteen; seven were forgers and the others had been locked up on the indefinite charge of "crimes against the state." These were liberated and halled as heroes by the mob. One was discovered chained to the wall of his cell. All had long beards and were in a wretched state, both mentally and physically. They were ignorant of the import of the assault upon the Bastile and when their cells were broken open they thought that they were to be mundered. They were carried through the yelling crowd to the Palais Royal, where they were shown the bodies of De Flesselles and De Launay, who had been dragged through the streets by ropes and escorted by the mob bearing torches.

The site of the old prison is now marked by a lofty column of bronze, crowned by a glided figure of Mercury, spreading his pinions in the act of flight. It is dedicated to the memory of the patriots of July, 1789 and 1836.

BATTLE OF THE BOYNE Father who art in heaven, that he has a spiritual consciousness, lacking in the lower kingdoms."

REV. DR. W. P. GEORGE.

Interesting History of the Events That Led Up to the Battle-Why William of Orange Is

The anniversary of the battle of Boyne -the day on which the power of William of Orange was asserted over that of the Endish King James IL-was observed yeserday in the usual way by the Kansas City lodge of that society, which had its foundation in the events commemorated, the Orangemen.

It is one of the customs of the society that the Sunday following the 12th of July—the anniversary of the battle—shall be the occasion of the coming together in a body to hear a sermon in some Protestant church. In the north of Ireland, where the society originated and still has its strength, the day is observed by parades and festivities, and it is not infrequent that such occasions are attended by a "coming to-gether" of the men who sport the orange badge and the "wearers of the green," for the latter, to whom St. Patrick's day stands pre-eminent as an Irish gala time, do not delight in the memories which endear July 12 to their Protestant northern neighbors. The local Orangemen have their regular observance of the exact anniver sary, but although the membership is con-siderable, something like 500, the demonstrations are not a feature in the holiday annals of Kansas City. The anniversary sermon, however, is always observed, and on this occasion Rev. Dr. William P. George, pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian church, accepted the invitation of the society to deliver it, and yesterday morning about 100 members of the society sat in a body as a part of Dr. George's congregation. The sermon, which was enjoyed by the usual large congregation in addition to the body for which it was especially prepared, covered a short period of English history previous to the decisive battle it commemorated, and went extensively into the effects of the change of rulers and the differences between the religion and statesmanship represented by the deposed king and his deposer.

"The old Orangemen's toast," said Dr.
George, was 'drink to the glorious past and immortal memory of the great and good King William, who saved us from popery, slavery, knavery, brass money and The toast covers the ground: King James was and King Charles had been a Roman Catholic sitting on a Protestant throne. A weak and subserv-lent parliament had allowed them to make practical slaves of their subjects. The disorganization which this and other causes had wrought had left knaves free to interpret and administer the laws in the courts and regulate personal conduct among the people. The expression 'brass money' was an apt personification of the depreciated currency of King James and that of 'wooden shoes' equally as apt a way of expressing the cumbersome, in-flexible drudgery which introduction or Norman customs had saddled on the peo-

King James Not Amenable to Law. "Under James an obsequious and subservient parliament had declared their sovereign not amenable to law, being himself the author of the law and his inconsistent and outrageous indulgence of the license thus granted, his open favoritism to the Roman Catholics and his trial of the nine bishops who refused to bear him out in this, resulted in the call that brought this, resulted in the call that brought William of Orange to the British shore. Landing in November, 1688, he gathered strength in the war, until on July 1-or 12 by the new style-he met and overthrew the maladministrator of English affairs. It is in honor of this event that I have the pleasure of addressing you to-day."

Dr. George here indulged in a little characteristic pleasantry in his well known way of stretching a point for its humorous effect.

"I am not an Orangeman," he said, "and yet I claim a fitness for the office of de-liverights.

"I am not an Orangeman." he said, "and yet I claim a fitness for the office of delivering this address. I claim it because I bear the name of your hero, William—my other name is George, but I disclaim connection with the British rulers of that name, and by the way, I also disclaim the Williams among the rules, excepting the two who were foreigners. I think, on consideration, I had better base my claim on the name of my church, Westminster, for that was the recognition word at the battle of Boyne. I have also seen, if you will consider this a claim, the life blood of William, the Third. Hanging in a glass cabinet in Cassiobury house, near Wadford, my native town, is the handkerchief that staunched the wound of William in that battle.

"The principle for which that blood was tive town, is the handkerchief that staunched the wound of William in that battle.

"The principle for which that blood was shed was inaugurated into the English government upon the consummation of the victory. William refused to become king upon the ground of his wife's lineage, thus, himself an heir to it, being the first to disregard the succession of the crown. He said that he would become king only upon the free choice of the people and in doing this he was first to recognize their right and put at naught the title through inheritance. As a ruler chosen by the people he gave them, a century before the French revolution and elghty-seven years before our own Declaration of Independence, the same principle in the bill of rights which was the spirit of these later movements—the principle that all power proceeded from the people and the right to govern came only through the consent of the governed. William was also the author of the Toleration act, insuring liberty of conscience and freedom of worship to all religious denominations—and this I wish, to say, is one essential principle of Protestantism, which, as William's cause triumphed over the Roman Catholicism represented by James. King William was the representative and head of the Protestantism of Europe, which was not only a protest of the people against the errors of Rome, but a protest of conscience against the errors of authority and spiritual domination.

"William, too, was the father of modern English statesmanship and, although during his reign he met more than one defeat in battle with the French, victory was always his in the field of diplomacy and English commercial and domestic prosperity dates from his election to the throne. His diplomatic work and influence were not confined to the Isle of Britain alone, but England's standing in the councils of the nations of Europe began with the work and wisdom inculcated into the administration of English affairs by William, of Orange."

EVOLUTION AND PROGRESS.

Hubert S. Turner Lectures Before the Local Lodge of Universal Brotherhood on This Subject.

Hubert S. Turner lectured before the local lodge of the Universal Brotherhood in the Masonic building last night on the subject, "Evolution and Progress." "A study of evolution shows that even so-called inanimate matter contains consciousness," said Mr. Turner. "Evolution divides itself into two classes-the evolution of physical matter and the evolution of the guiding intelligence controlling that matter. A study of the marvels revealed by the simple 'cell,' the basis of all living by the simple 'cell,' the basis of all living matter, shows a consciousness that is even more marvelous than the human consciousness, for the latter is a complex organism, but in the case of the cell, we have all the functions of a complex organism being performed by a homogeneous speck of matter.

"The chemical constituents of protoplasm (the basis of the cell) do not differ from inorganic matter. This shows the origin of life is not to be found here.

"The scientific definition of protoplasm is 'matter potentially alive.' But this does not explain its origin. The actions of this protoplasm clearly show the workings of an inner entity. This is what is meant by evolution, the unit becoming complex, and increasing its area of experience. Evolution is synonymous with progression. Evolution is synonymous with progression. Evolution is simply the changing of the form in response to the inner idea. As ideas postulate an Ideator, an inner entity is necessary."

postulate an ideator, an inner entity is necessary."

Mr. Turner then traced this germ up through the vegetable and animal kingdoms, showing that all the time it was advancing by virtue of its past experiences until he reached the human kingdom. "Man is the efforescence of all the lower kingdoms, in his animal and personal aspect, but he has now got so much nearer his Independence Avenue Methodist church yesterday in the absence of Dr. M. S. Hughes, who is taking a short vacation in the Northwest.

Few attended the morning services on account of the rain, the small congregation meeting in the chapel instead of the auditorium. Dr. Wright gave an expositional talk on the Scriptures, showing that Christ was the central thought through it all.

"I get aboard a British man-of-war and pick up a thread," said the speaker by way of illustration. "I break it in two and behold in the center a scarlet line. A jacktar cuts off a section of one of the huge cables of a section of one of the huge cables of a section of one of the huge cables."

I pick it up and look, and there in the center of it is the same scarlet line. That scarlet thread runs through every rope in the Son of God, or the Word is to be beheld in every chapter of the Bible."

Dr. Wright took up several words and treated them etymologically, tracing their original meanings and displaying a thorough knowledge of language. He made use of a vase of flowers to illustrate how little, in reality, man knows about creation and startled his hearers by telling them he owned all the elegant residences on Independence boulevard.

"Don't think I have lost my head," he said. "I do you then in the I derive yesterday in the absence of Dr. M. S.

When a tall, uneasy-looking man shook the grated door that separates Cashier Collins, of the money order department, from the postoffice lobby, the latter gentleman wondered if he was about to encounter the crank that called on Assistant VanValkenburgh a few weeks ago and demanded $100,000 reward for discovering a band of banker counterfeiters in Springfield, Mo. banker counterfeiters in Springfield, Mo. He had tried every office in the government building, but at last hit on the assistant attorney as the most likely to have the price of the reward on hand.

Mr. Collins looked up inquiringly and reaffirmed a frequent expression of thankfulness at the presence of the grated door. The man's first remark started him guessing, however, and the next left him non-plussed.

The man's first remark started him guessing, however, and the next left him nonplussed.

"You ought to do some painting out here," the man began, and while Mr. Collins was protesting that he never paints, the man continued: "Your smokestack needs painting bad; I'd like to get the job."

Mr. Collins was alarmed. He didn't know he had a smokestack, but, at any rate, it oughtn't to be allowed to go unpainted. It had never occurred to him that he should be looked upon as the owner of the government building, so he was again surprised when the man told him he was suspected of being the same.

"I never knowed who owned the building," said the man, "but you always have this door shut and sit where you can look and watch things, so I had an idea mebbe it was you. Anyhow, the smokestack out there needs paintin' bad, and I'm lookin' for the man who'll hire it done."

Mr. Collins sent him below to see the engineer, and the engineer sent him up to see Mr. Kessinger, surveyor of the port and custodian of the building—and Mr. Kessinger was out.

I tried so many times to get her to come back to me, but one day she would say she would come and the next she would not. So, in April, I went to Deepwater, Mo., where she was visiting her sister and told her if she would only come back I would forgive her everything and I thought the baby should be brought up by us together, for I love him just as much as she does. She consented and I was to send her a ticket to come here, but one day she wrote me she was not going to live with me any more. When the jail was under quarantine, Mrs. Young was almost frantic to see her husband. She came regularly and asked Mr. Wilson if he was well. She was never satisfied with the answer that he was.

"Are you sure?" she would ask. "Have you seen him to-day?" And not until the jailer assured her that he had seen Young several times that day would she go away satisfied.
